

health concerns with trained registered nurses. Over the next 2 years participants' attitudes, knowledge and behaviour will be followed through questionnaires, interviews and tracking of their use of health services. Patterns of use will then be compared with those of a similarly matched group in Kelowna, BC, that did not receive the book. "US studies have shown that every dollar you spend on patient education you get a return of between $3 and $4 dollars in reduced utilization," Hume says.

Participant reaction has been positive. "I think it's great," says Michael McEvoy. He and his wife has already consulted the book twice about viruses affecting their 2 children, and both times they decided not to visit the doctor. "It just made us feel more confident that we should manage these things at home."

Reaction to the project among the region's 450 doctors has been mixed, with some criticizing the $600 000 price tag as another example of government waste. "Maybe I am cynical, but I don't think it will work — in fact they may find that the number of visits increases," says Dr. Stephen Roome, a family physician whose comments echo those of many area doctors. "I don't think there was a need for it. There are already dozens of health books that people can buy if they are interested."

However, some of his colleagues have been pleasantly surprised. "I read through it with a jaded eye, looking for things to criticize," says Dr. Glen Lowther, chief of emergency medicine for the Capital Health Region. "But to be honest, I couldn't find anything. I think it is an excellent information source."

Dr. Brian Winsby, a Victoria physician who chairs the project's steering committee, says that despite some doctors' negative response, the program was launched because of requests from physicians. During fee negotiations with the government, physicians complained that increased utilization was unfairly being blamed on doctors. "They asked for a patient-education component, and this is the result," says Winsby. — © Anne Mullens

Clinical assessment program launched in Newfoundland

A new program to assess and upgrade family physicians was announced during Newfoundland and Labrador's 1997 Rural Health Forum, held at Memorial University. The program will be aimed primar-

CMA thinks it has right recipe with new cookbook

Anne Lindsay, Canada's doyenne of healthy cooking, has collaborated with the CMA to produce a new cookbook in which the emphasis is divided between recipes and detailed nutritional information.

She says the goal of Anne Lindsay's New Light Cooking was to publish a cookbook that not only contained attractive recipes but also helped readers eat a more healthy selection of foods. Each recipe includes a detailed analysis of its nutritional content and Canada Food Guide recommendations on how many servings the recipe contributes to a person's recommended daily total.

"For years I have tried to find ways to make healthy foods tasty," said Lindsay. "So I was delighted when the CMA asked me to work with it to produce a book that was sound in scientific research and also dispelled the myth that healthy foods had to be bland and boring."

The book, which is being released this month to coincide with National Nutrition Month, is Lind-say's fifth dealing with the light-cooking theme. The previous 4 have sold more than 1.5 million copies.

Lindsay said part of the appeal of her books is that the recipes are quick, easy to prepare and use ingredients that can be found easily. She said the new book takes that convenience one step further by providing answers to commonly asked questions about healthy eating for people with conditions such as hypertension and cardiovascular disease.

Lindsay wrote the book and created the recipes with the assistance of registered dietitian Denise Beatty, while a CMA-appointed advisory board verified the nutrition-related health information. It is available to CMA members for $20.95, plus $3 shipping and handling; the nonmember price is $25.95, plus $3. Related taxes — the HST in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Newfoundland and the GST everywhere else — also apply. It can be ordered by calling 800 663-7336 x2307. — Steven Wharry