Recruiting foreign-trained professionals

The editorial by Amir Attaran and Roderick Walker about Shoppers Drug Mart’s practice of recruiting pharmacists from South Africa raises an important moral point, but in my view the authors’ argument is seriously flawed. As a family physician trained in South Africa, I can assure readers that the recruitment of South African pharmacists to Canada is often far more active than the “passive enticement of job advertisements” mentioned by Attaran and Walker.

I was recruited with paid airfare and travel costs, assistance with immigration, a lucrative contract with free housing and an income guarantee. Hundreds of other South African pharmacists in Saskatchewan and Alberta have also been enticed to come to Canada. When I was in a practice in small-town Saskatchewan, I in turn travelled to South Africa twice to recruit pharmacists to join my Canadian practice. The Regina Qu’Appelle Health Region recently went on recruitment drives to the United Kingdom and to the Phillipines and proudly announced its successes in the local newspaper.

The fact that Shoppers Drug Mart poaches pharmacists on a bigger scale and in a more businesslike way makes its recruiting efforts no more wrong than efforts to recruit physicians like the ones I have mentioned. If Attaran and Walker want to take the moral high ground then they have to concede that poaching medical professionals in any way is wrong, whether it is by big business or by smaller players such as individual physicians or health districts.

John C.B. Morris MB ChB
Family physician, Gardiner Park Medical Clinic, Regina, Sask.

Competing interests: None declared.

Involving physicians in MedsCheck

I completely agree with Shawn Tracy and Ross Upshur that physicians should become more involved in MedsCheck, a program in which Ontario patients with chronic diseases who take 3 or more prescription medications daily can have a free yearly consultation with a pharmacist. I also agree that it would be worthwhile to immediately submit the MedsCheck results to the patient’s family or specialist physician(s). However, on the 3 occasions I did so, I was advised by the physician’s office staff that they did not wish to receive MedsCheck reports because they were too busy to address the issues described in the report. Instead, it was suggested that if the patient felt it would be beneficial, they could bring their MedsCheck report to their physician’s office for a scheduled appointment. It seems to me that this is a more realistic course of action than bombarding physicians’ offices with unrequested MedsCheck documentation.

Anna K. Steven RPh
Pharmacist, Port Weller Pharmacy, St. Catharines, Ont.

Competing interests: None declared.

REFERENCE
DOI:10.1503/cmaj.1080019

Correction

A News article in the Feb. 26 issue about the activities of astronaut Dr. Scott Parazynski contained an error. Parazynski undertook 7 spacewalks, not 3 as stated. CMAJ apologizes for this error.

REFERENCE
DOI:10.1503/cmaj.080337