

Code blue

■ Cite as: CMAJ 2018 December 17;190:E1484. doi: 10.1503/cmaj.181018

They call it agonal breathing, that last grouper gasp, wordless coho teeth telling the unfavourable truth, tails beating exploded rockfish bellies, too quickly pulled toward air, inaccessible and now remote, the salty darkness splayed across deck our primitive hindbrain longing for depth.

Sarah K. Andersen BSc(Hons) MD

Department of Medicine, University of Toronto, Toronto, Ont.

This article has been peer reviewed.

